Welcome everyone. Tonight another piece in our chapter development armchair seminar series designed to help give new and existing KFTC leaders in our chapters the tools needed to strengthen our work in chapters. Tonight’s webinar will focus on selecting and developing good local issue campaigns. We will start out by understanding a bit more about grassroots organizing and grassroots power, before then diving into selecting a good local issue. We will spend some time defining what a problem is and what an issue is – how they are different, how a problem can turn into an issue, and characteristics of good local issues.

We will then put that knowledge to work by spending a chunk of time reviewing a couple of examples of local issues and discussing the pros and cons of each and ranking them.

And then we will have a short bit of time at the end for questions and discussion. If there are more questions than we have time for, I am happy to talk one on one to discuss all of this information more.

Let’s first start with introductions to learn who all is on the call and where everyone is from. Let’s go around and say our name, where we live, and if we are a member of one of KFTC’s chapters.
In order to understand how to select a good local issue – we need to first get a good understanding of what grassroots organizing is. Grassroots organizing is the fundamental way that KFTC works for change. There are many ways to work for change. In order to understand what community organizing is, it can be helpful to understand how it is different from other approaches we are familiar with, including service and advocacy.

Of these three ways to work for change, there is no right or wrong strategy. It is just helpful to understand what we mean by each and understanding the important role that grassroots organizing plays and shouldn’t be overlooked.
Here are some of the characteristics of direct-service and advocacy.

Review slide

Is there anything anyone would add to these criteria? Can you think of other examples of direct-service or advocacy?
Community organizing is the process of building power through involving a constituency in identifying problems they share and the solutions to those problems that they desire; identifying the people and structures that can make those solutions possible; enlisting those targets in the effort through negotiation and using confrontation and pressure when needed; and building an institution that is democratically controlled by that constituency that can develop the capacity to take on further problems and that embodies the will and the power of that constituency.

➢ All three of these approaches to change, direct-service, advocacy, and organizing are essential.
➢ We wouldn’t want to live in a world without any of these approaches.
➢ Too often we rely only on service and advocacy and don’t build or support organizations that empower people who are directly affected by injustice.
We often think about power as a bad thing. But it isn’t necessarily bad. And successful grassroots organizing campaigns relying heavily on building and using power. Power is really just the ability to get things done and expand what people believe is possible. Understanding power – what it is, how we can build power through grassroots organizing, and how we can use it is essential in grassroots organizing and shapes our ability to win on the issues we care about!

What is power?

- The ability to get things done,
- The ability to get what you want,
- The ability to make – or prevent – change,
- The ability to make your message heard,
- The ability to shape what people believe and what they think is possible.
There are lots of ways we build and use power in KFTC through grassroots organizing. What do we think of the ones listed here? Can we think of others?

These are all very important to winning on issues we care about. We need to always be building power, so that we can use it to win. Every issue we select to work on, we should think about how it can be used to build our power. If working on an issue won’t allow us to build our power in any way, we should examine if that is really the best issue to work on. In grassroots organizing, we should never be stagnant in terms of building power – we should also be growing, working towards something.

Are there any questions or other thoughts to building and using power in grassroots organizing?
Problems can be lots of things. It is really anything that is undesirable. Review the problems listed on the slide.

Ask the group to name some other problems. Ask the participants to think of various types of problems, ranging from specific personal problems and local community problems to national and international problems.

Looking at this list, what could be other definitions of a problem? Example definitions are, “A problem is something that lowers the quality of people’s lives.”

There is a difference between problems and issues and that not all problems make good issues.

Issues are things that groups can work on (has a solution, is “winnable”) Groups can turn problems into issues A problem becomes an issue when a group calls attention to it and proposes a solution An issue is a problem which a group can work on and get results.
Here is another definition of a good local issue.

Immediate, means in terms of either the benefit folks would get from victory or, the harm they would suffer from inaction. ‘You don’t have the right to vote’ is a lot more immediate than “would you like to be part of a community planning process’.

Specific refers to both the problem and its solution. Vacant buildings are a problem. That building that we want torn down by the end of the month is an issue.

Winnable. There needs to be a simple solution that can be achieved. This can be hard. It is a balancing act to factor in on all of these components and determine whether it’s worth starting out on. Some factors to consider include: who is effected by the problem, and can I get to them? How much does the problem hurt them, and how hard are they likely to fight? Are they able to escape easily, or is standing and fighting their only option? What resources are we likely to need and can we get them? On the other side, who benefited from the problem the way things are, and how much? Could they easily give us what we want, or would it cost them, and how much? Who else is peripherally hurt - or helped - by the way things are? How would the solution we seek change this equation? Could we go after something that would help us just as much, but get us more friends? In the end, all we can do is step out. The more we’ve tried to peer ahead, the less likely we are to stumble.
Here is a list of characteristics that make an issue into a good issue

The facilitator should point out that a good issue does not have to meet all of the criteria, but they are guidelines for choosing. Also, some characteristics are more important than others. Ask participants which characteristics they feel are most important.

The importance of issues being winnable and building the organization should be emphasized during this discussion.
Community organizing is a process of people working together and being effective. It is a dynamic process, that requires constant attention and effort. It is impossible to use community organizing to get to a certain point and stop, or to build a community organization up and then stop reaching out for new folks and taking on new issues. Some people will want to take on big issues, and some will identify more achievable goals. You may want to a more winnable project so that the group can get stronger together. Although simpler, lower risk issues could be addressed quickly and behind the scenes, it is especially important that they be handled the same way the big ones would. For example, even if you know that the city will put up a stop sign upon request, you should still hold a press conference on the street corner and a march to city hall to demand it, then negotiate with the traffic engineer over which tree it will be posted on. A musical mom I know tells her children that ‘practice makes PERMANENT, GOOD practice makes perfect!’ If people in the early stages of a group learn that all it takes is a phone call to get things done, they’ll look to the same strategy next time. Community organizing is a process of teaching people to work together, and how to be effective.
Issue Identification Exercise

- Pretend that you are a member of a community group in another county that has just won an important victory on an issue you have worked on for over a year. Now, instead of just letting your group fade away, you want to use your new power by taking on a new issue. Consider each of the next four problems and then decide which ones would make good issues for your group to work on.
Issue: Overweight trucks on bridge

- A big out-of-state coal company is using a bridge on one of the main roads in your county to haul coal. The trucks are illegally overloaded and the bridge is beginning to crack. Everyone is scared that the bridge is going to collapse, especially since the school crosses it each day.

- The county government has the power to put weight limits on the bridge and the sheriff could fine overloaded trucks using the bridge. Some county officials are aware of the problem but they are dragging their feet and not taking any action.

- After doing some research, you recently found out that the company has made large contributions to most of the officials’ campaigns. There are a lot of concerned parents who want to do something about the problem before an accident occurs.

Read through the slide together and then discuss. What do we think about this local issue? What characteristics make it a good issue? What characteristics make it not a good issue?

Good characteristics: There is a specific solution, clear targets, immediate need/problem, many people are concerned about it, it could be winnable, it is specific and easy to understand, could bring in new members, makes a difference, develops leaders (if done well).

Not good characteristics: Could be divisive?
What do we think about this local issue? What characteristics make it a good issue? What characteristics make it not a good issue?

Good characteristics: It has a specific solution, the money could be used for good things in the county that could potentially bring more people into the group?

Bad characteristics: Devisive in the group, how many in the group see this as a problem?
What do we think about this local issue? What characteristics make it a good issue? What characteristics make it not a good issue?

Good characteristics: You see a solution – someone to promote the county to outside businesses.

Bad characteristics: Would need to go out and talk to unemployed people first to learn what sort of solutions they want and if they would be a part of this kind of issue work. The solution is less specific than is ideal (how do you measure success?)
What do we think about this local issue? What characteristics make it a good issue? What characteristics make it not a good issue?

Good characteristics: Sounds like many people may be interested in working on it. Expanding trash pickup is a winnable solution if that is what the group wants to work on and the target would be clear (county government).

Bad characteristics: Not sure if expanding trash pickup will help with the littering in the creeks and along the roadways. It may, but it also may not. Does it build the organization?
